

U.S. Export Control Training Programs

U.S. Export/Trade Regulations affect you -get a competitive advantage by learning how to make them work for you, by staying ahead of your competition.

U.S. Export Controls are some of the most complex and stringent in the world. The United States Government regulates the international transfer of U.S. origin technical data and products through many different agencies and varied legislation with the intent of preventing unauthorized transfer of technology and know-how.

Because the U.S. is such a significant source of technology for Australia, and an important potential market, it is imperative that the Australian industry understands the U.S. regulations. In an attempt to assist with this issue, the Centre for Customs and Excise Studies within the University of Canberra has developed a series of U.S. Export Control Training Programs.

One-day practical training programs:

- Understanding US Export Controls from a Non-US Perspective - An Overview
- US Export Control Authorizations - What Non-US Parties Need to Know
- International Traffic in Arms Regulations - ITAR

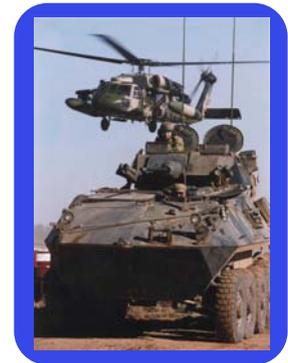

Presented and led by;

Gregory J. Creeser and Julia Reed

Training Professionals:

The training will be delivered by Mr Gregory J. Creeser and Ms Julia Reed. Greg previously worked as Corporate Director for International Trade Compliance with Goodrich Corporation in Washington, U.S.A. He also held the position of President of the board of directors of the Society for International Affairs (SIA) from 2004-2006, a volunteer non-profit educational organisation dedicated to the education of the U.S. export community on all aspects of technology transfer.

Julia previously worked for the Australian Government, within the Department of Defence's Trade Control and Compliance Section. Julia developed the Industry Outreach Program and introduced a series of training programs in regard to Australian export controls. She has also worked with a number other government agencies to assist to build their training and awareness programs.
